Course Overview

Trinity's interdisciplinary M.Phil. in Medieval Studies equips students with the critical skills needed for in-depth research on medieval texts, sources, and artefacts while allowing students to specialise in particular approaches in accordance with their interests. The teaching on the programme takes full advantage of Trinity's world-leading holdings of medieval manuscripts and other artefacts, as well as those of other Dublin institutions and opportunities available for students to explore the built remains of medieval Ireland.

Key Features

- Teaching from world-class experts on the Middle Ages.
- Access to Trinity's world-leading holdings of medieval manuscripts.
- Offers students an excellent grounding in key methodologies.
- Opportunity to specialise in accordance with individual interests.
- Large, diverse student cohort.

Preferred Applicant Experience

Students will usually have an undergraduate degree in a humanities subject, for instance History, English, a Modern Language or Theology, and have taken modules on medieval topics. This is not however essential, and interested students are invited to contact the course convenor.

Career Opportunities

Our students work across a wide range of fields, including cultural heritage, media, teaching and management. A considerable number go on to doctoral study, either in Trinity or elsewhere, often with funding.
